

DELOITTE

For a number of years Deloitte has had a strategic partnership with Ulster University Business School, which has provided a fantastic platform to engage in the BrightStart Scheme together.

This unique scheme is the first Level 6 apprenticeship in Northern Ireland and the first apprenticeship for Deloitte in the U.K.

It offers a unique blend of a degree in business and technology, combined with professional recognised qualifications and on-the-job learning. Ulster University Business School has a very important role to play alongside Deloitte to help them deliver their strategic ambitions and objectives for Belfast over the coming years.

Deloitte needed a learning partner who understood the culture of the firm as well as their needs and demands, hence Ulster University Business School was the perfect partner.

CELSIO

Technology company Celsio has collaborated with Ulster University Business School in the creation of a new framework for innovation skills development. FISK® is a competency-based matrix for sustainable innovation and is aimed at accelerating how organisations develop innovation capability and confidence in a rapidly changing world.

Recognising the importance of this initiative, Invest NI awarded an Innovation Voucher to fund a collaborative project between Celsio and UUBS. The Business School undertook an academic review of FISK®, including a critique of the framework against innovation standards, and an evaluation of the model against both current and emerging academic research and thinking.

Charlie Tuxworth, Co-founder and Director of Celsio said:

"The creation of this strategic relationship with UUBS has been an important milestone for Celsio. The team at UUBS provided us with a level of insight, critique, and context for FISK® that we would not have had the time or skills to do ourselves. We have plans to continue to collaborate with UUBS as we further refine FISK® and use it to set new standards for innovation skills development."
